FACULTY INVITED TO LEAD OR PARTICIPATE IN STUDIES RELATED TO PURDUE STUDIO TEACHING AND LEARNING TOOLS

Professor Jon Harbor believes all students should learn how to communicate effectively, which is why he incorporates multiple writing assignments into his classes. But with nearly 250 students in his online introductory geography course, administering writing assignments and providing adequate constructive feedback seemed impossible.

That’s why Harbor turned to Gradient, an online writing and peer assessment tool developed by ITaP, which turned a daunting educational endeavor into a manageable course staple. Now, Harbor is one of five professors participating in research to measure the effectiveness of one or more tools in the Studio by Purdue suite, which is designed to optimize student success.

ITaP and the Office of Institutional Research, Assessment and Effectiveness (OIRAE) are inviting other faculty members to either lead or participate in various studies, or simply try out the tools in their courses. Harbor decided to explore how Gradient affects students’ writing skills throughout a course after implementing the application in 2014. He expects to engage graduate students in the research as well as IT staff.

“I know a lot about course content and goals, but I’m not an expert in online learning, which is why I worked with ITaP to develop my first online course in 2014,” Harbor says. “This is a great collaboration, and I encourage anyone to reach out to the folks at ITaP to explore how their tools can enrich the teaching and learning experience.”

Gradient, for example, provides an organized and structured digital platform for students to evaluate each other’s work, thereby making writing assignments a viable option for large enrollment courses. Using Gradient, Harbor now incorporates multiple writing assignments into his course each semester. In addition to encouraging students to learn from their peers, Gradient fosters connections between assignment instructions and the criteria used to evaluate students’ work. Continued…
“The vast majority of students in my class are not majoring in earth, atmospheric, and planetary sciences,” Harbor says. “Many of them will forget content specifics, but analysis and writing skills will stick with them. Communication will be crucial to almost every career they pursue after college, and I believe this is an important part of what we can do to help students overall.”
